The effects of bullying are the same for children and adults.

Suicide is a very real outcome for some victims of bullying and as such its incidence needs to be taken seriously.

Even a Single Act Can Have a Massively Detrimental Effect to Someone's Mental Health

by Anthony Carlino

I recently included in the ‘Transtopia’ youth group the topic of bullying and how best to deal with it. While bullying is often thought of as an experience most likely to be encountered by children and adolescents, it is also a reality in adult life for those unfortunate enough to encounter adult bullies. We know that bullies exist everywhere - in our school system, in universities and workplaces.

Probably the widest and most inclusive definition is that bullying is any act or words that make another person feel less than who they truly are. Most people are likely to experience bullying which is characterised by a number of examples including but not limited to mocking; putting someone down; making threats; belittling; ignoring; intimidating someone; and physical violence.

While most workshops focus on the valid importance of how to deal with a bully, many of them fail to address an important reality for many victims - namely that advising a victim of bullying to ‘ignore’ the bully is often impractical (especially if you see them regularly) and more importantly it does not make them stop.

It is important to realise that even a single act can be bullying and have a massively detrimental effect to someone's mental health. The effects of bullying are the same for children and adults. Often though, it is more difficult for adults to talk about how they feel or report it. Sometimes even when an adult commits suicide due to the cumulative effects of bullying, family or loved ones might not even know the person was being bullied at all.

Never forget that bullying is a crime and bullies are criminals. Their actions, whenever practical and possible, need to be reported and action taken. Suicide is a very real outcome for some victims of bullying and as such its incidence needs to be taken seriously both in terms of getting support for the victim and the bully.

Polare Magazine is published quarterly in Australia by The Gender Centre Inc., which is funded by the Department of Family & Community Services under the S.A.A.P. Program and supported by the N.S.W. Health Department through the AIDS and Infectious Diseases Branch. Polare provides a forum for discussion and debate on gender issues. Unsolicited contributions are welcome, the editor reserves the right to edit such contributions without notification. Any submission which appears in Polare may be published on our internet site. Opinions expressed in this publication do not necessarily reflect those of the Editor, The Gender Centre Inc., the Department of Family & Community Services or the N.S.W. Department of Health.

The Gender Centre is committed to developing and providing services and activities which enhance the ability of people with gender issues to make informed choices. We offer a wide range of services to people with gender issues, their partners, family members and friends in New South Wales. We are an accommodation service and also act as an education, support, training and referral resource centre to other organisations and service providers. The Gender Centre is committed to educating the public and service providers about the needs of people with gender issues. We specifically aim to provide a high quality service, which acknowledges human rights and ensures respect and confidentiality.